Letter from the President

The following letter was received Dec. 23, 2014, before the election results were announced and was written as a Chair's report but is published, instead, as the regular Letter from the President column.—Ed.

by George Phillies, Incoming President of N3F

Greetings from the chair of the 2014 N3F Directorate. It has been an interesting year for all of us. We are going to try to look forward to the future, and attempts to make sure that the future is better than the past. That isn't always going to work equally well, but I am greatly hopeful that our organization is emerging from a slow. And will do much better in the future than it did in the past.

Consider all of the changes the last 60 years of science fiction, fantasy, horror, and other genre fiction have seen. 60 years ago, it was not uncommon for there to be only one science-fiction program on television. It might have been Captain Z-Ro, Commando Cody, Rocky Jones, or the Twilight Zone, but for much of the time 60 years ago there was only one science-fiction television show and it was only on once per week. If a science-fiction film came out, it was fairly unusual and worth going into simply because there would be no other choices for some time.

If you preferred books, you had to hope that the local drugstore collection would get a change, as it did every week or two. Alternatively, there were perhaps a few bookstores in town and, if you were lucky the bookstore owner stock science-fiction as opposed to viewing it as beneath his worth.

Look where we are now. A great fraction of the large-market motion picture films are special effects masterpieces, doing things totally beyond the dreams of the producers of Earth Versus Flying Saucers or War Of The Worlds. The less appreciated Mysterians was actually in its effects and complexity of alien plot was a step forward. We now have an entire science fiction channel and in some areas apparently most of an entire anime channel.

Thanks to the Internet, used bookstores around the world can compete with our attention, so with some effort vast numbers of books that would otherwise have passed out of sight can still be recovered by a dedicated reader. More spectacularly, electronic book publishers such as Third Millennium, Smashwords, and Kindle have vastly increased the number of titles that we can read.

Two decades ago, I went to a science-fiction convention. Assembled in a panel were publishers' representatives from the major then-extant science-fiction publishing firms. They expressed the opinion that one or two thousand new manuscripts of novels were produced every year across the country. The manuscripts descended on the poor defenseless publishers somewhat like the hordes of the Mongols. Some of them were ludicrously bad. But of that thousand, it was estimated that there were several hundred that some publisher could've published and not be embarrassed to have discussed at a later date. There were perhaps 40 or 60 novels that were entirely good. Which 40 or 60 were entirely good would vary a bit from publisher to publisher, because different publishers had different tastes, but of that 40 or 60 a half dozen would be published. Each other publisher would have a different 40 or 60 and publish another four or six. Most novels would never see the light of day.

Under modern conditions almost all of those novels will become available electronically on some reasonable schedule. That's guaranteed by the existence of those electronic publishers I mentioned above. After all, SmashWords in the last few years has published a third of 1 million books incorporating over 12 billion words. If you have a novel and want to go through the work of getting it out the door, you can get it published for something between free and $100 or $200. That dollar sum includes paying off the cover artist to give you a good cover. As a published novel writer, I can assure you that "good cover" is a good idea.

I could go on a great length. The message is simple. For fandoms of all sorts, the Internet has meant an enormous improvement in where we are, what we are doing, and how readily we can all communicate with each other. It is by taking advantage of these great advances in modern technology that we are going to set the National Fantasy Fan Federation on the march to being the world's greatest as well as oldest international science-fiction and fantasy organization. ■

If you believe in the possibility of peace and freedom and justice and progress, all the news can shake that brief pretty had.

On the other hand, if you lose the conviction that these things are possible, it probably makes it even less likely that they will.

Any way I wrote a song about it (It's got a good beat; you can dance to it), and I've got the recording up at my blog at: Blues for the Idealists (You know who you are). Hope you'll check it out. <https://dumbfoundingstories.wordpress.com>

Not long after my loc on the newest TNFF, I have here Tightbeam 271, and I am going to try my hand with this one. Don't worry about dates, you create these when you have the time, and when life allows for it.

[There seems to be a third-year gafia/fafia curse in N3F editor—and that was one tradition I tried to avoid and failed at.—ed.]

I have read many histories of SF fandom, and there are always differences, updates and revisions of just about any written history. Any article that might call itself a definitive history, I'd take with a grain of salt. I know of a history of fandom in the 70s that was started, but I think the author/researcher discovered that such a history would be simply too big to write up. Fandom truly exploded in size and scope during that time.

[But we try, anyway—which is both futile and fun.—Ed.]

The article about your place in fandom...fandom has become very much a social forum, with hundreds of potential activities to take part in, and hundred of fellow fans who will share that interest. My own interests have varied and changed over time. I started as a Star Trek fan, and have moved to conrunning to club management, to masquerades and costuming, to fanzines and correspondence, to steampunk and other areas, where we can have some fun, and perhaps make our mark. Where letters of comment were a big part of fanzine fandom, it would now seem that the paper zines, and even the .pdfed zines, have been replaced with blog-type websites. As far as I go, I'm either horribly old-fashioned, or I am retro. I prefer the latter.

[As are most things in fandom. It's important to remind ourselves that it is a hobby and we do it because it is supposed to be fun—for everyone.—ed.]

Time to finish up. I hope this will add something to the next issue. Take care, and see you then.

Our law firm adopted a few kids for the Christmas Adopt-A-Family season. Most are young kids and under age 10 and in genuine need, but fairly generic in requests (clothes, toys). Then, I read this profile:

"Michael, 18 (his last year in foster care) is in foster care and was removed from his parents because of neglect. Michael has been in the foster care system since he was 8 years old. His older siblings have all aged out of the system. His father died several years ago and his mother died last year. He has minor learning disabilities and some intellectual delays due to neglect from his birth parents at an early age. He can become very anxious easily, but he is very sweet and has a great sense of humor. The caregiver is struggling and would be unable to provide many holiday presents for the children without the support of Adopt-A-Family. She is grateful for the opportunity to make this season a cheerful one."

And what is Michael asking for? A coat and art supplies (markers, paper, and paint, etc). And he is a big Star Wars fan.

A science fiction nerd art kid. I got on the phone and called Rich, telling him we needed to cut back on our present budget for each other as we were buying this kid some stuff.

He got everything he asked for on his list. Even though there was less under the tree for us, so far 2014 was my favorite Christmas, ever.

Many thanks for Vol. 73, No. 3 of The National Fantasy Fan. That's a great cover by Shawn Cruz; it would have looked great in the extreme Jokerish colour.

Congratulations to David on his service to the N3F, and getting the elections going. I see the deadlines have just passed, so I am hoping that the members have taken part to elect a new slate of officers. David, what does your future hold here? If you're not running for office, is there another bit of work you'd like to do?

[I plan on being editor for a while—although I would love for any interested folks who would like to eventually take over the job to contact me. It's fun—but I fear I've been doing it too long. I would love to pass the torch on to the next victim. —Ed.]

A great list of movies, and a bit of time for it all to happen. I suspect I won't see most of them, but I am usually picky about what I see. The last movie I saw was The Imitation Game with Benedict Cumberbatch. I wish we could all give NASA a little more credit for what it does for the small amount of money it gets, and then give them more money.

This really is the election issue, as it says on the front cover, so there isn't a lot for an outsider like me to comment on. All I can really do now is wish the Federation a happy new year, and a prosperous 2015. Many thanks, and I hope to write something better for the next issue. ■

(1954 – 2014)

Graham William Joyce was born October 22, 1954, in Keresley, England, a small mining village near Coventry, and grew up there. He received a bachelor of education degree in 1977 from Bishop Lonsdale College and a master of arts degree (English and American Literature) in 1980 from the University of Leicester.

His first book, Dreamside, a dark fantasy novel published by Pan Books in 1991, explored shared dreaming and the subsequent consequences for the students involved. His next novel, Dark Sister, won the British Fantasy Award in 1992. Subsequent works included House of Lost Dreams (1993); Requiem (1995), a World Fantasy Award winner; The Tooth Fairy (1996), British Fantasy Award winner; The Stormwatcher (1998), British Fantasy Award winner; The Facts of Life (2001), World Fantasy Award winner; The Limits of Enchantment (2005); Memoirs of a Master Forger (2008), British Fantasy Award winner [published in the United States in 2009 as How to Make Friends with Demons]; The Silent Land (2011); Some Kind of Fairy Tale (2012); and The Year of the Ladybird (2013) [published in 2014 in the United States as The Ghost in the Electric Blue Suit].

He was awarded a PhD by Nottingham Trent University (with a dissertation on Thomas Pynchon), and taught there from 1996 until his death. He once used the pseudonym of William Heaney.

In 2013 Joyce was diagnosed with aggressive lymphoma and was undergoing treatment when he died on September 8, 2014. He is survived by his wife, the former Suzanne Johnsen, and their two children.

RICHARD A. BROOKS

(1941 – 2014)

Richard Alan Brooks, 73, passed away May 19, 2014 in Parkview Regional Medical Center, Fort Wayne, Indiana.

Richard was born in Angola to Mark L. Brooks and Phyllis Colpus Brooks on April 9, 1941. He attended Scott Center School and graduated from Angola High School in 1959.

He joined the United States Air Force in 1960 and served in the Cuban Missile Crisis.

After his discharge he earned a degree in Electrical Engineering at Tri-State College (Known now as Trine University).

He worked at Square D in Huntington, but his Sachs-Murray Arthritis forced him into an early retirement. He also had worked as a watchman for the Pinkerton Detective Agency.

Rick loved science fiction and cats (not always in that order), and wrote short stories and letters of comment which were published in several science fiction fanzines. He was a member of N3F for decades, a proud member of its Hoosier contingent.

He also was a big fan of the Trine University Thunder softball Team. An avid supporter of the team, he took pride in showing up to every home game until illness made that impossible.

One of his last acts before being hospitalized was to vote in the local primary.

He is survived by a sister Elizabeth Brooks of Fremont, Indiana and a brother James Brooks of Houston, Texas.

He was preceded in death by his parents.

In lieu of flowers donations may be made to the Steuben County Humane Society.
